Why in the World Do Cops Do That?!

By Mike Frederick

A career in law enforcement requires officers to make numerous adjustments, both in their personal and professional lives. Many of these adjustments and concessions are widely known, even to laypersons: Low salaries, shift work, repeated exposure to high stress events, and (of course) the risk of injury or death on the job. There are other adjustments unique to the law enforcement world, however, that aren’t as widely known, such as the long-term health effects of the aforementioned list, social ostracization, and Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder. Thankfully, many cops successfully manage all of these issues and serve productively for 25 to 30 years.

One of the most interesting of these lesser known issues becomes evident to cops very early in their career: Civilians just don’t get us sometimes. Officers quickly figure out that the “gallows humor” (that’s what psychologists call it, anyway) that we develop to combat the very real stresses of the job doesn’t necessarily translate well at dinner parties. We also notice that we tend to get the same questions repeatedly.

- “You ever shot anyone?”
- “What is the grossest thing you’ve ever seen?”
- “My (insert correct person here- brother, cousin, roommate, etc.) got arrested last week, can you help him?”

- “I heard that so-and-so got arrested for so-and-so and he was in his own yard—how is that legal?”

Once officers understand the curiosity and get their heads wrapped around the notion that questions (and suggestions) from the public are a natural part of the job, addressing those issues becomes much easier. This is not to say, of course, that we can answer all of the questions or that all of the suggestions are workable. That being the case, the issue shifts, then, to one of communication and transparency. If we tend to get the same questions over and over, why not get ahead of the curve and let the public know what we’re up to in those areas. If we can’t tell citizens something (usually due to legal or professional restrictions), at least explain why we can’t.

SBPD adopted this philosophy in the Fall of 2010, and (not surprisingly) our citizens responded well. Although our dedication to transparency goes well beyond answering questions and addressing suggestions, that’s certainly part of the equation. We also publish a detailed report of our activities each month, right down to our use of force and complaints received on officers. Our Quality of Life case management system creates structured interaction with citizens who are experiencing issues in their neighborhoods, whether those issues are criminal in nature or merely civil problems like parking or property disputes.

Along these lines, Jim Duckett (our Town Administrator) asked me to produce a short briefing for Council and any members of the public who attended our annual budget retreat in March of this year. The presentation, entitled “Law Enforcement Management..."

for Laypersons,” was designed to answer some of the questions we receive and explain that while we listen to all suggestions, we can’t implement them all. Although the presentation was short, we tried to address some of the recurring and recent queries and conversations we’ve enjoyed with citizens over the past year or so, even as we explained that there is a method to our madness. Like most organizations, we always have a reason for doing (or not doing) what we do. Here’s one example, just to illustrate the point.

One of the public’s most common points of interest is our vehicle fleet. I receive four or five calls weekly to compliment / insult the paint scheme, advise that we need more cars / fewer cars, or that we should transition to this or that model vehicle. Fleet management, even in an agency our size, is a management science, and there are standard formulas used throughout the industry. I remember flying to a week-long fleet management training course in Michigan just after assuming command of a patrol division at another agency many years ago and thinking, “How complicated can this be?” A week later, I was flying home with a whole new understanding of the liability issues attendant to using non-police package vehicles, electrical system amps-at idle, idle-time versus miles-per-day, rotation schedules, maintenance as a safety issue, and how to staff fleets to extend the service life of the vehicles (which keeps the vehicles safer, and, of course, saves money). Accepted fleet management doctrine can be a little dry, so suffice to say here that there are real liability issues that preclude using standard vehicles versus the more expensive police package, and yes, officers sometimes idle their cars at calls rather than shut them down. This is due to the heavy electrical draw of the onboard equipment. SBPD is blessed to be able to provide our patrol officers with the standard squad car police package, including a built-in HD digital video system, internet-capable ruggedized laptop terminals, two-way GPS tracking, high-power digital radios, siren / light control units, and DC chargers for flashlights and cell phones. We shut the cars down whenever possible, obviously, since a full-stop engine burns no fuel, but sometimes on anticipated short stops it’s better to idle to avoid shutting down some of the electronic gear.

Fleet size is likewise determined using formulas, based not upon the square mileage of the jurisdiction but on the number of cars assigned to a shift (to avoid hot-swapping vehicles which run 24 hours a day).

“There is a method to our madness. Like most organizations, we always have a reason for doing, or not doing what we do.”

Again, without belaboring all of the numbers, we consistently run below the optimum recommended number of patrol vehicles at SBPD, but are able to do so safely due to our seasonal population and demand level swings. “SBPD gets why citizens are interested in our operations, and we’ve responded by increasing our transparency rather than defensively shuttering up.”

At the retreat, we discussed several other areas of interest such as crime mapping, our approach to anti-burglary efforts, and how to correctly compare agencies using wide-spectrum socio-economic data and service demand (rather than simpler base population comparisons). Naturally, many questions went unanswered even after a 40-minute presentation.

Here’s the bottom line, however. SBPD “gets” why citizens are interested in our operations, and we’ve responded by increasing our transparency rather than defensively shuttering up and circling the wagons as some organizations are wont to do. Can I impart 25 years of police management knowledge to every citizen who calls? Of course not, but we can (as a policy matter) continue to respond as we do and try to share some information. An extremely small minority would rather gripe than participate in a productive conversation, but through the years I have found that giving folks a little “peek behind the curtain” makes believers out of the vast majority of those who contact us, and they genuinely appreciate the feeling that we are partners in maintaining our quality of life here, not adversaries. We’ll continue to do that, via presentations like the one at the budget retreat, and one conversation at a time.

From the Fire Chief

It is amazing how time flies. It seems as if it was just yesterday that we were in the summer season of 2011 and here it is the approach of summer 2012. As most of you know warm weather never really left us with the exception of a few days. With that said and the approach of the summer season, it is once again time to prepare for what is shaping up to be another good year along the coast. We are excited to announce that the Horry County and Georgetown County Emergency Management Departments along with the National Weather Service, Franks Entertainment and the Inlet Square Mall are partnering to bring you Storm Fest 2012. This is primarily a kid event to teach them about the perils that surround them in a fun and interactive way. And in the process of educating and entertaining the kids we get to educate the parents as well.

This event will take place at the Inlet Square Mall on Saturday June 9th from 9am to 2pm. There will be displays throughout the mall and static displays outside, along with a Weather Spotter Class, Tornado Treasure Hunt for the kids, Storm and Safety related booths and displays and meeting your local meteorologists. Local Fire Departments along with other emergency responders will be on hand to answer questions about severe weather and operations in your town. Come and learn about severe weather and bring the kids for some educational fun.
